damage in the spinal cord (author's transl)]. One may distinguish between neural lesions in the spinal cord, which arise from degeneration and necrosis of the axons, and vascular lesions. The first one is due to interruption of impulse conduction, the second one is produced by interruption of blood supply. The first one, because of its frequent occurrence and reversibility, is of major importance, but the second one, the more interesting, more frequent and more serious, is of less interest to the neurosurgeon. In the case of neural lesions, the form of the clinical picture depends on whether the sensory or motor fibers are involved. This is discussed, in relation to the clinical picture, the 82157476af
